Adrenal Function & Endocrine System Balancing Formula

Horses' adrenal systems are more challenged and stressed than ever before, especially for the heavy schedule of the performance horse. Many health imbalances and anxious behavior in horses stem from adrenal glands that are either exhausted or struggling to produce adrenaline.

If your horse is experiencing spikes of anxiousness and nervous behavior that seem out of character, he may be experiencing adrenal imbalance, a common precursor to adrenal exhaustion. Conversely, if your horse is exhibiting low physical energy, moodiness, and recurring tendencies to get sick, it could be a sign that your horse is experiencing a form of adrenal exhaustion, often the result of exposure to long-term stress, which can seriously affect many aspects of health.

The adrenal glands are at the center of a horse's primal "fight or flight" stress response. They release adrenaline into the bloodstream in response to stress of any form. The adrenal glands also release hormones that help your horse's body deal with stress, tissue repair, and maintain blood pressure. When stress is sustained, the cardiovascular, endocrine, and immune system become distressed.

For many horses, their adrenal glands have been working in overdrive or been under stress for so long that the adrenals themselves become exhausted, which causes fatigue, raw nerves, anxiousness, and a general breakdown of health.

Adaptogenic herbs, those that help a horse's body adapt to stress, and nervine herbs, those that soothe the nerves, are very important to helping the adrenal system recover.

Equine Adreno•Aid™ is natural herbal support with both adaptogenic and nervine herbs that is formulated to rebuild, balance, and support the adrenal glands. These herbs provide necessary minerals and herbal source vitamins that are rich in adrenal sustaining components. This special combination of herbs also helps to relieve anxiousness and rebuild the nervous system.
